TRAMPOLINE PARK INJURIES

Trampoline parks are largely unregulated, and many injuries are possible. Some of the common types of injuries that occur at trampoline parks include the following:

- Broken leg
- Arm fracture
- Dislocated joint
- Bruises
- Sprains
- Traumatic brain injury
- Spinal cord injury

Injuries can happen in any number of ways at trampoline parks. Frequently, injuries happen when the victims have accidents with the equipment or with other patrons while performing stunts such as double bump jumps or playing erratically.

Injuries caused by contacts with equipment

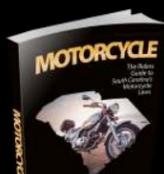

Many injuries occur when children land on the padded areas that cover the edges where the trampolines join. The padding is meant to provide some protection, but it is sometimes insufficient to prevent injuries from occurring. Park operators have a duty of care to make certain that their equipment is properly maintained and that it conforms to the ASTM 2970 standard. They should use checklists to inspect the equipment each day, documenting their observations and the repairs that are completed. In addition, park operators should also perform inspections and repairs at the intervals suggested by the manufacturers to help to prevent injuries from happening.

What to do when children are injured at trampoline parks

Many parents wrongly believe that they cannot do anything when their children are injured in trampoline parks. This is because a parent is required to sign a release of liability before his or her child will be allowed to participate. However, these releases will not stand up in court when the injuries result from a failure of the operators to fulfill their legal duties of care.

When children are injured, the parents should first promptly seek medical attention. They should get the names and contact details of the attendants and supervisors who were on duty as well as any witnesses who saw what happened. If they can, they should take photographs of the area where the accident occurred.

DOCTORS' ADVICE ON STAYING HEALTHY

Exercise, healthy eating, and a positive outlook are important to maintaining good health, but there's more you can do. From the Good Housekeeping website comes this advice from doctors on further steps you can take:

- Don't overdo antibiotics. Although antibiotics are useful in fighting infections, overuse can weaken your immune system and cause weight gain (because of their effect on gut bacteria). Talk with your doctor about alternatives.
- Watch your Vitamin D levels. The sun is an important source of Vitamin D, but for people who don't (or can't) get outside that much, supplements can prevent Vitamin D deficiency.
- Stay hydrated. Drink plenty of water throughout the day. Dehydration can cause bloating, constipation, headaches, and fatigue.
- Get enough rest. Getting enough sleep is important, but so is resting while you're awake. Practice yoga and meditation so you're not just rushing through your day until you crash.
- Be skeptical. Don't believe the hype behind every new diet or health fad. Investigate before launching into a new routine that might not provide all the benefits it claims.

TEEN DEPRESSION

Being a teenager can be tough, and many teens suffer depression as a result. The symptoms aren't always obvious, though. The American Academy of Family Physicians advises adults to watch for these clues:

- Trouble focusing
- Anxiety
- Anger and frequently losing temper
- Changes in appetite
- Reluctance to go to school or participate in social activities
- Complaints of feeling sick
- Lack of confidence, or the feeling that they can't do anything correctly
